I think I know why the RSA was roundly condemned at the time - it was just too big and could only be summed up in the language of the day. And I agree that we're being a bit silly by bothering about wikileaks when there are much more pressing things to worry about. The republican party owns all the most recent US wars and two ongoing military actions - I think we should try and negotiate with them first. But I can't help thinking that there's a bit of post-9/11 cynicism about the US war on terror there. It's not just 'journos'. It's my impression that there are two main groups that find the interception of private communication of a journalist to be objectionable - those who feel that privacy laws (like the wiretapping laws) are very important and those who simply don't like the idea that journalists might justifiably 'go outside' that system and publish to their advantage. I was prepared to defend the Times and Sun until their editors were arrested and jailed (in the UK, as I understand it). It was 'only' one of them that I loathed. And even then I thought we'd simply have to live with the stupidly naive attitudes of that age. Now, both the Times and Sun are very well known as important newspapers. Newspapers are important
